

Virgin Soil, Vol. 2 (Classic Reprint)

The sky was overcast with low clouds, and although it was not perfectly dark, and in front the cart-ruts could be distinguished standing out on the road, to right and left, everything was in shadow, and the outlines of separate objects fell together into big confused patches of darkness. It was a dim, treacherous night; the wind blew in gusty, damp squalls, bringing with it the scent of rain and of broad fields of wheat. When they had passed the oak bushes which served as a landmark, and had to turn off into the by-road, driving was still more difficult; the narrow track was quite lost at times. The coachman drove more slowly. I hope we are not going to lose our way, observed Nezhdanov, who had been silent till then. No; we shan't lose our way! answered Fokkerilov. Two misfortunes don't come in loose company. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and don't occur in the book.)
