

The Life and Exploits of the Ingenious Gentleman Don Quixote de La Mancha (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Life and Exploits of the Ingenious Gentleman Don Quixote De La Mancha Michael De Cervantes Saavedra, the inimitable author of Don Quixote, was born in the year 1549, and most probably at Madrid; though other towns of Spain, as Esquivias, Seville, and Lucena, have claimed the honour of his birth. At least, it is certain, he lived at Madrid, as appears from the following superscription of a pleasant letter of Apollo to him: To Michael de Cervantes Saavedra, in Orchard Street, fronting the palace belonging to the Prince of Morocco, in Madrid: postage half a real, I mean seventeen marevedis. From his childhood he was so fond of books, that he tells us he was apt to take up the least scrap of written or printed paper that lay in his way, though it were in the middle of the street. But he addicted himself chiefly to the reading of poetry and novels, as is evident from his own writings, and especially from the curious and pleasant scrutiny of Don Quixotes library. Cervantes left Spain (but in what year is uncertain) and went into Italy; where he became Chamberlain to Cardinal Acquaviva at Rome; and afterwards followed the profession of arms, under the famous Commander Marco Antonio Colonna. It is certain, from his own account of himself, that he was present at the great sea-fight of Lepanto against the Turks, in 1751; in which action he lost his hand, or at least the use of it, by a shot from the enemy.
