

The Complete Works of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe in Ten Volumes, Vol. 4 of 10 (Classic Reprint)

When, a few years ago, the copies of the following letters were first made known to us, it was asserted that they had been found among Werther spapers ;and it was pretended, that, before his acquaintance with Charlotte, he had been in Switzerland. We have never seen the originals .however, we would not on any account anticipate the judgment and feelings of our readers; for, whatever may be their true history, it is impossible to read them without sympathy. PART THE FIRST. How do all my descriptions disgust me, when I read them over !N othing but your advice, your command, your injunction, could have induced me to attempt any thing of the kind. How many descriptions, too, of these scenes, had I not read before I saw them !D id these, then, afford me an image of them, or, at best, but a mere vague notion? In vain did my imagination attempt to bring the objects before it: in vain did my mind try to revolve from them some thoughts. Here I now stand contemplating these wonders ;and what are my feelings in the midst of them !I can think of nothing, I can feel nothing; and how willingly would I both think and feel! The glorious scene before me excites my soul to its inmost depths, and impels me to be doing; and yet what can I do what do I? I now sit down and scribble and describe. A way with you, ye descriptions !D elude my friend, make him believe that I am doing something, that he sees and reads something.(Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the
