

Sir Edw: Seawards Narrative of His Shipwreck, and Consequent Discovery of Certain Islands in the Caribbean Sea, Vol. 2 of 2 (Classic Reprint)

Kingston until the 21st of the month. Our former lodgings having been sufficiently agreeable, and our brown landlady remarkably obliging, we were glad to find them unoccupied, and took up our residence as before. I was not now perplexed and overpowered with business, as on our last visit, and therefore sat down very quietly with my dear wife, after our landing, to make ourselves comfortable. I invited Captain Drake to dinner; and we dressed with some little attention to the prevailing fashion of society: but I would not again submit to the torture of a friseur; and therefore, after arraying myself in an embroidered waistcoat, popped on my trusty A donis over my father-A dam-like curls, and looked sufficiently, I suppose, like a modern fine gentle man. Drake was an excellent fellow, but had no pretensions to modish attire; indeed, he despised it, and never could see me in my wig without a smile: I also could laugh at myself when alone; but before others, n6t excepting Drake, I took care to preserve my gravity and self-possession; without which, I knew all external marks of a superior quality would Jose their value; and VOL.
