Or I reland the average Englishman knows little. Of Irishmen he knows two kinds. Travellers who have landed at Dublin and penetrated to Glasnevin or followed the coastline as far as Howth, have described one of these in numerous books and magazine articles. Associated with pigs sticks and potatoes he is found wearing a tattered old hat, a long-tailed coat of grey homespun, knee-breeches and ventilated shoes. Nature has given him a long upper-lip and a nose turned skyward. He says, Tare an ages, ye spalpeen, holy murther, the divil, arrah, be jabers, and more to that pattern. His wife is himself in a minor key. She says The saints presarve us with any communication circumstances may require. Her name is Norah; she dusts a chair with her apron and curtseys very nicely to an Englishman. He of the second class is mystic, wonderful. Our knowledge of him is from the poets. His background is of wolfdogs and round towers, his gaze is backward to the old time of collars of gold, and he carries a harp, for his use of which please see Moore s Irish melodies. Strange to say, we who have been born and bred on the island have not been able to find the Englishman s Irishmen. The failure may be due to lack of powers of observation, or to the common inability to see the wood for trees. If the English travellers have observed and described correctly, it is certain that variations from the type are extremely numerous over areas as yet by them
