

The Complete Works of Gustave Flaubert: Embracing Romances, Travels, Comedies, Sketches and Correspondence, Vol. 6 (Classic Reprint)

Dinner and a Duel. REDBRICK passed the whole of the next day in brooding over his anger and humiliation. He reproached himself for not having given a slap in the face to Cisy. As for the Marchale, he swore not to see her again. Others as good-looking could be easily found; and, as money would be required in order to possess these women, he would speculate on the Bourse with the purchase-money of his farm. He would get rich; he would crush the Marchale and everyone else with his luxury. When the evening had come, he was surprised at not having thought of Madame Arnoux. So much the better. What the good of it? Two days after, at eight o'clock, Pellerin came to pay him a visit. He began by expressing his admiration of the furniture and talking in a wheedling tone.
