

Young Folks Treasury, Vol. 6 of 3 (Classic Reprint)

The men or women are few who do not love to listen to travelers tales, nor desire themselves to go out and see the world; and to the imaginative youngster the hills which set a blue bound to his home horizon seem to hide a fascinating paradise of wonders and joy which he resolves to explore when he has grown up. It has always been so and doubtless always will be, although the world seems now so small to the globetrotter, and the newspaper tells us, day by day, what is happening in countries which a few years ago were almost as remote and inaccessible as the moon. Where Stanley laboriously marched for weeks to meet Livingstone, one may now go by rail in a single night. The Falls of the Zambesi, utterly out of reach and lone, when Livingstone described them only half a century ago, are furnishing electric light and power to highly civilized towns. AB urnaby need no longer ride for weary days across a desert to reach Khiva, for Cook swill furnish him a railroad ticket thither, or to the cities of Marco Polo smysterious Tartary, far beyond. Even Mecca itself, where Burton penetrated only after spending a lifetime in perfecting his disguise, may soon be the terminus of a few days tour from Cairo or Jerusalem. One who has been to the other side of the globe is no longer therefore remarkable. Not only London and New York, but many smaller cities as well, have Travelers clubs and Explorers clubs. Even women conduct expeditions into savage lands, and climb the peaks of the Andes or Himalayas. Have this modern ease of journeying into once remote and forbidden regions, and the plentitude of advance information as to what may be seen there, decreased travel or dulled the desire? Seemingly (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the book.)
